

Rita Brown shares her thoughts on the connection between language and culture. She states: "Language is the road map of a culture." But what exactly does she mean by saying that?

Personally, I believe that Rita is referring to how language ^{reflects} mirrors the eras that it exists in. For example, in "De olden days" English used to have a singular noun when referring to someone. No, it wasn't "you", it was "thou". People only started exclusively using "you" as a gesture of respect, and so "thou" became a thing of the past. The same could be said for slang, not a long time ago "gay" merely meant "happy", but currently its meaning changed to a person's sexual orientation.

One of my personal experiences is rather silly, but it is relevant nonetheless. In recent years, my generation has managed to include slang like „bussin“ or „simp“ in the official English dictionary. Again, it is silly, but it's a part of our history now.

In conclusion, I believe that Rita is right! Language has been an important part of our world's culture for millions of years, and it's fascinating to see how much our main form of communication has evolved.
